

Are you judging others?

The state we experience when we judge a person or his actions, can be described as freedom that we manifest as a need to confirm our ego.

Judgment intervenes as an expression of our interior world towards the exterior one. I mean we judge others according to our inside needs.

I'd dare to say that, through tattoo and humble opinion, let's not judge a person according to his sharing of his own experiences.

Man has the free will to express pertinent opinions on the beautiful people surrounding him. He also has the freedom to restrain from it. But why should he?

A person cannot keep silent for a long time because silence is the most difficult form of abstinence. We need to take our own opinions, understand them in their real sense and express them without judgement. I mean we should say like this " Ma man, here's a solution..." But we usually choose the contrary, we hit and slap the situation only to make it look like military heroic effort through which the ego rises in the jugular, makes our lips tremble for a short while and then suddenly disappears.

I'd summon Stefan the Great to come watch us. He'd be laughing out loud to see a nation of winners and creators battling in mud with expressions and slow fading judgmental opinions as weapons, throwing metaphoric rocks at each other when contradicting or fighting.

Man was designed to look for solutions, to go beyond the horse and chariot where he was born. To look for solutions which are hiding behind the obstacles because being judgmental only makes him feel useless.

We can still take into consideration judgmental opinions, but in order to steer away from making mistakes, I say we should only judge others according to our own image. What do you say about that?
